

Hafka'at Kiddushin: Towards Solving the Agunah Problem In Our Time^{*}

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, Ph.D.

Marriage As An Institution

There are two fundamental ways to understand the legal underpinnings of the institution of marriage:

Marriage as a legal institution is a contractual arrangement created by the two partners to the marriage. Just as the two parties create the marriage contract, so too it is only they who can terminate it.

Marriage is indeed a contractual arrangement between the two parties, but it requires the formal ratification or validation of the city or state in which those two parties live, or the local judicial authorities. From this perspective, therefore, since a marriage is only effectuated, or rendered legal, by such an extrinsic authority, it can only be terminated by the decision of some similar authority. This is the situation in most of the western world.

Judaism, the Torah and Jewish tradition, adopted the first path. "If a man takes a woman" (Deuteronomy 24:1) – the husband "takes" his partner as his wife by way of betrothal and marriage. And therefore "he shall write her a bill of divorce, and give it in her hand" (ibid.) – in order to break the marital bond, the husband must give his wife a get. A court's decision on the matter does not suffice.

Betrothal - A Relationship of Mutuality

At the time of betrothal and marriage, both the bride and the groom perform mutual transactions – that is to say, they assume mutual obligations, the groom toward his bride, and the bride toward her groom. The Hatam Sofer (1762-1839) describes the transaction that is performed as kinyan halifin, barter, the classic two-way transaction in which each of the two parties gives something and receives something else in return: "In the case of betrothal, there is no buyer or seller, but rather halifin. [The groom] 'sells' himself, giving over his person to his betrothed by assuming specified obligations [vis-a-vis his betrothed], namely, sustenance, clothing, and cohabitation. In return, [the bride] 'sells' herself, giving over her person by assuming the obligation of cohabitation by Torah law, and handing over her handiwork by Rabbinic law. This is halifin."¹

This mutuality notwithstanding, the active partner in the acts of betrothal and marriage, as well as in the act of divorce, is the husband. In betrothal, the Rabbis specify that "he must give [the betrothal gift] and he must recite [the betrothal formula]" (see Kiddushin 5b); in marriage, it is the groom who brings the bride into his house (the huppah) (Shulhan Arukh, Even HaEzer 61:1); and in divorce, it is the husband who writes his wife a bill of divorce, and gives it into her hand. The husband's active role in these areas – despite the mutuality of the relationship as expressed by the Hatam Sofer – might stem from the fact that it is he who is regarded as the active partner in the sexual act, which is truly the exclusive and therefore defining aspect of marriage, or else from the fact that it is he alone who is obligated to have children.² Nevertheless, Jewish law attempted as much as possible to reach a greater degree of mutuality between husband and wife even with regard to these ritual ceremonies. Thus, betrothal requires the woman's consent – “with her consent, yes [the betrothal is valid]; without her consent, no” (Kiddushin 2b). And furthermore, the Rabbis enacted that the husband must write his wife a ketubah at the time of marriage. That document, which obligates the husband to pay his wife a considerable sum of money should he choose to divorce her, was instituted in order to prevent rash and hasty divorces (Ketubot 10a).³ And while by Torah law a woman may be divorced against her will, a thousand years ago Rabbenu Gershom (the Light of the Exile, 960-1028) enacted that a woman can only be divorced if she receives her get of her own free will. Just as the Torah requires that the husband grant the divorce of his own free will,⁴ so Rabbenu Gershom's enactment requires the woman's free-will acceptance of the get as well (cited in Rema's strictures to Even HaEzer 119:6).

The Problem of Agunah

All this having been said, the halakhic principle that the husband cannot be forced to divorce his wife against his will (Yebamot 113b, Gittin 49b) opens the door to the agunah problem should a woman seek a divorce and her husband refuse to grant her a get.⁵ This problem is especially exacerbated when recalcitrant husbands acquire Civil Divorces - which enable them to marry again in a secular fashion - and then “hold up” their more religious wives for a great deal of money in exchange for the religious divorce. There are two aspects to this agunah problem; it is both a personal tragedy for the agunah herself, and also a challenge to Halakhah as a reflection of “righteous laws”. Leaving an agunah inextricably tied to a husband with whom she cannot live contradicts the Torah's command, “And you shall do that which is right and good” (Deuteronomy 6:18). So too it stands in conflict with the obligation to walk in the ways of God (see Sotah 14a; Rambam, Sefer HaMitzvot, positive commandment 8), Who is “merciful and gracious” (Exodus 34:6); moreover, the Halakhah itself declares that “its ways are ways of pleasantness” (Sukkah 32b; Yebamot 87b). Clearly, it must be possible to find a solution to this complicated problem within the framework of Halakhah. And indeed, our Talmudic authorities already viewed the agunah problem as one that requires non-conventional solutions and leniencies – “on behalf of the agunah, the Sages ruled leniently” (Yebamot 88a). In dealing with this problem, the Talmudic Sages, the Geonim, and the Rishonim suggested solutions and enacted legislation that reflect their concern about the honor of a woman who seeks a divorce from her husband.

Forced Get

The Mishnah in Ketubot (77a) states that in certain cases the Jewish court may indeed compel the husband to divorce his wife: “The following are forced to divorce [their wives]: One afflicted with boils, one stricken with a polypus [whose nose or mouth is ill-smelling], a scraper [one who collects the excrement of dogs], one who smelts copper, and a tanner.” In the first two cases mentioned in the Mishnah, the husband is forced to divorce his wife because of a medical condition from which he suffers and which makes it impossible for his wife to live with him. In the last three cases, divorce is coerced upon the husband because of the foul odors that he bears on account of his profession, disallowing an intimate relationship with others. So too a man suffering from impotence may be compelled to divorce his wife.⁶ In these cases, the court may apply pressure upon the husband to divorce his wife until he says that he agrees to the divorce (Arakhin 21a). In that way the husband is viewed as divorcing his wife of his free will,⁷ and the problem of a divorce being imposed upon the husband against his will does not arise.

Prenuptial Monetary Conditions

The Jerusalem Talmud cites two examples of prenuptial conditions that were customarily attached to the ketubah at the time of marriage in order to protect the woman's interests:

Ketubot 5:8: "Rabbi Yosa said: Those who write,⁸ 'If he comes to hate [his wife]', or 'if she comes to hate [her husband, the woman will receive a divorce as well as financial compensation]', it is considered a monetary stipulation, and the stipulation is valid."⁹

Ketubot 7:6: "It once happened ... Rabbi Mana said to them [= the woman's relatives]: 'Bring her ketubah, so that we may read it.' They brought her ketubah, and found written in it: 'If this woman marries this man, and does not wish the partnership'¹⁰ [to continue, i.e., if she seeks a divorce], she shall [receive a get and] collect half of her ketubah."

In our day as well, various prenuptial agreements have been formulated, in which the husband obligates himself to pay his wife a large sum of money for her maintenance in the event that he delays giving her a bill of divorce. Such agreements are intended to protect the woman, and force the husband to grant her a divorce. The Rabbinical Council of America endorses the use of prenuptial agreements of this sort in the United States.¹¹ But this arrangement does not solve the agunah problem in all cases, e.g., where a wealthy husband is ready to pay for his wife's maintenance, but refuses to divorce her, or where the two parties never signed such an agreement.

The Plea, "He is Repulsive to Me"

The Mishnah (Ketubot 63a) teaches the law pertaining to the rebellious wife (according to the Gemara's conclusion, a woman who refuses to cohabit with her husband), according to which a specified sum is deducted from the woman's ketubah each week for as long as she persists in her refusal to cohabit with her husband, or as the law was later emended, a four-week warning period is followed by immediate forfeiture of her entire ketubah. In the course of its discussion, the Gemara asks: "What is the case of a rebellious wife?" The Amoraim disagree about this point: "Amemar said: Where she says, 'I wish to remain married to him, but [I refuse to cohabit with him because] I wish to cause him distress.'" In other words, the woman wishes to use the sexual relationship as a bargaining chip. "But if she says, '[I refuse to cohabit with him, because] I find him repulsive,' we do not force her [nor do we reduce her ketubah]. Mar Zutra said: We do force her." Even if the woman says that she cannot bring herself to have sexual relations with her husband because she finds him repulsive, she is forced to do so by way of the weekly deductions from her ketubah, or by way of the public announcements and immediate forfeiture of her ketubah. The law is in accordance with Amemar that a woman is not forced to live with her husband when she claims that she finds him repulsive. She is only considered a rebellious wife if she uses sex as a weapon, but not if she finds her husband repelling. The Gemara concludes that when a woman claims that she finds her husband repulsive, “she is made to wait twelve months for her bill of divorce.”

Amemar asserts that if a woman claims that she finds her husband repulsive, we do not force her to cohabit with him. But the question whether or not we force him to give her a get remains open. Rashbam (R. Samuel b. Meir, 1080-1174)¹² understands that according to the Gemara’s conclusion, the husband is required to divorce his wife immediately, even against his will. The words, “we do not force her”, imply that we do not force the woman to return to her husband, but we do indeed force the husband to grant his wife a divorce. This is also the position of Rambam (1135-1204)¹³ (Hilkhos Ishut 14:8): “A woman who refuses to cohabit with her husband is called a rebellious wife. We ask her why she refuses [to cohabit with him]. If she says, ‘I am repelled by him, and cannot willingly engage in sexual relations with him,’ we force him to divorce her immediately, for she is not like a captive who must surrender to someone whom she hates. She is divorced without receiving any part of her ketubah, but she takes the worn clothing that is still extant.”

The Geonim in general¹⁴ and Rav Sherira Gaon (906-1006) in particular¹⁵ understood from what is stated at the end of the Talmudic passage, “And she is made to wait twelve months for her bill of divorce,” that according to Talmudic law the woman is made to wait twelve months, and only then do we force her husband to grant her a divorce; however, their assumption is that the Talmudic Sages did sanction compelling the husband to grant a divorce to a wife who claims she finds him repulsive. In a later generation, the Geonim went one step further than the Talmud and enacted that the Court force the husband to divorce his wife immediately. This seems to be the position of R. Isaac Alfasi (1013-1103) as well.¹⁶

Most of the Geonim and early Rishonim maintained that when a woman claims that she finds her husband repulsive, we compel the husband to grant an immediate divorce – either by Talmudic law or by Geonic enactment. Some authorities, however, disagreed. The original and arch proponent of the position rejecting the possibility of forcing a divorce in the case where a woman claims that she finds her husband repulsive was Rabbenu Tam (1100-1171). Rabbenu Tam¹⁷ understood the Gemara as follows: If a woman claims that she is repelled by her husband, and that she is ready to waive her ketubah in order to leave him, we do not force her, that is to say, we do not say that her waiver is regarded as having been given in error, and so we force her to remain with her husband until she changes her mind. Rather, we say that if her husband is willing to divorce her without paying out her ketubah, he may do so. But under no circumstances do we force him to grant her a divorce. Rabbenu Tam was aware of the Geonic enactments on the matter, but for various reasons rejected the possibility of enforcing those enactments beyond the period of the Geonim.

Even though the majority of Rabbenu Tam’s predecessors maintained that when a woman claims that she finds her husband repulsive, we compel the husband to grant an immediate divorce, once Rabbenu Tam expressed emphatic opposition to a forced divorce in such a case, few arose later to disagree with him. So too ruled the Shulhan Arukh (Even HaEzer 77:2): “If a woman refuses to cohabit with her husband, she is called a rebellious wife. We ask her why she refuses to cohabit with him. If she says, ‘I am repelled by him, and cannot willingly cohabit with him’ – then if the husband wishes to divorce her, she does not have any part of her ketubah, but she takes the worn clothing that is still extant." According to the Shulhan Arukh, the husband cannot be compelled to divorce his wife against his will, even if she finds him repulsive.

There were, however, a number of Aharonim who were ready to rely on Rambam and the Geonim, and force the husband to grant a divorce when she claims that she finds him repulsive (if not with actual physical force, then at least with milder forms of coercion). Here are a number of examples:

R. Hayyim Palaggi (1788-1869) – (HaHayyim VeHaShalom II, 35): "It would therefore appear that once a year or two have passed following their separation, we force the husband to divorce his wife, for two reasons: The man cannot live without a wife, and the woman too cannot live without a husband. And all the more so, if she is young, for we are concerned that it will lead to her ruin, her being chained to her husband [against her will]. Go and see how the halakhic authorities ruled leniently regarding an agunah, especially when she is young. They went as far as to say that we may rely on the opinion of a single authority. And all the more so, the obligation rests upon the judges of Israel to rule leniently on this matter, lest they come to mishap."

Tzitz Eliezer (IV, 21; V, 26): "Nevertheless, there is ample room to discuss compelling a divorce when the claim, "He is repulsive to me," is supported by genuine reasons, and the court sees a pressing need to force the husband to divorce his wife so that she not fall into bad ways." At the end he suggests that the court force the divorce by way of giving the husband the option to choose between granting his wife a divorce or paying for her maintenance.

Marriage Made in Error

As will be explained below, the Talmud recognizes the possibility of hafka'at kiddushin, a religious court using its authority to cancel a marriage that had heretofore been legally valid. Totally different is the notion of a marriage that had been entered into in error. Should it become clear that the parties entered into the marriage in error, e.g., an essential piece of information regarding one of the parties had not been known to the other party, the marriage may be declared as never having been legally valid, and therefore never having taken place at all. In such a case, a get is not necessary. The question arises as to when it may be argued that a marriage was founded upon an error. It would appear from the responsa of Rabbi Moshe Feinstein¹⁸ that four conditions must be met in order to declare a marriage as having been based upon an error:

1. The heretofore-unknown factor must have existed already at the time of marriage.
2. The unknown factor only came to the other party's attention after the marriage had already taken place.
3. The previously unknown factor affects the essence of the marital bond (e.g., impotence), or is a major defect that makes it impossible to live with the affected partner (idiocy).
4. The unknown factor is a matter that would seriously bother most people,¹⁹ and deter them from marrying the affected partner had they known about the matter from the outset.

It was recently suggested that the criteria for error be expanded, so that the discovery of a negative personality trait, such as anger or miserliness, be recognized as a valid basis for a claim of a marriage made in error.²⁰ According to this suggestion, if a woman claims that she would never have married her husband had she known earlier about his rage or miserliness, her marriage can be cancelled on the grounds that it had been based on false pretenses. It would seem to me that the criteria established by Rabbi Feinstein cannot be expanded. Indeed, were it true that personality traits can serve as grounds for arguing that a marriage had been entered into by mistake, the need for a get would never come into play, for everyone appearing before a divorce court maintains that had he or she been initially aware of this or that personality trait, the marriage would never have taken place.

The Agunah Problem Today

With all the good intentions we have seen reflected in the Rabbis' concern for the agunah's plight, the very fact that a woman seeking divorce must receive a get from her husband places her at a disadvantage. Cases will arise in which the husband refuses to grant his wife a divorce, and the woman will then remain an agunah for many years. The problem became particularly acute following the period of the Emancipation and the institution of civil marriages and divorce. In most western countries, even if a man married a woman in a religious ceremony and in accordance with Jewish law, the husband may divorce his wife in a civil court. The husband knows that the civil authorities will not interfere, and he can take advantage of the situation and delay giving his wife a get in order to punish her or extort money from her. The Rabbinical courts have no authoritative say in the manner. Even in Israel where the Rabbinical courts have authority in matrimonial law, the judges are not always able to deal effectively with a husband who absolutely refuses to grant his wife a divorce. The situation has been greatly alleviated of late, since the secular courts now impose sanctions on a recalcitrant husband who refuses to give his wife a get after having been ordered to do so by a religious court; those sanctions include removal of his professional and driver's licenses and even incarceration. Nevertheless, there are some husbands who prefer lengthy jail sentences to granting their wives a divorce, and in such cases women presently have no recourse.

It would appear however that a Halakhic solution based on Talmudic texts is available to us. It merely awaits our initiative to make full use of the latent possibilities. Surely the Torah promises us "righteous laws". A legal solution exists, and it is our responsibility to find the judge to put it into practice. We must activate the legal possibilities within the framework of an eternal Halakhah that displays compassion to the agunah. The solution which I am suggesting is that of hafka'at kiddushin, canceling a marriage. Even though betrothal and marriage are regarded as a contract that was created by the two parties and can only be terminated by some act performed by them, a number of Talmudic passages prove that in certain circumstances the Rabbis are authorized to cancel a marriage without the husband's consent and even against his will.

Talmudic Passages that Deal with Hafka'at Kiddushin

Five different Talmudic passages deal with hafka'at kiddushin. Two of those passages deal with hafka'ah taking place already at the time of betrothal, whereas the other three passages deal with hafka'ah occurring later at the time of divorce. We will focus mainly on those passages dealing with hafka'ah occurring at the time of divorce, for only that type of hafka'ah is relevant to our problem. But in order to understand the principles underlying hafka'at kiddushin, we must consider all the passages dealing with the issue.

Babylonian Talmud

The three passages dealing with hafka'ah at the time of divorce:

1. Gittin 33a discusses the case of a husband who cancels a get that he had sent with an agent without notifying the agent or his wife.

The Mishnah at the beginning of the chapter states: "If someone sends a get to his wife ... at first he was permitted to convene a court somewhere else and cancel it [the husband was permitted to cancel the get that he had already sent to his wife via an agent before a court in a different location and not in the presence of his wife]. Rabban Gamliel the Elder enacted that they not do this for the sake of the social order (tikkun olam) [so as not to increase the number of mamzerim or agunot]." The Gemara cites a Baraita that deals with a person who violates Rabban Gamliel's enactment, and cancels a get not in his wife's presence: "Our Rabbis taught: 'If he cancels it, it is cancelled; these are the words of Rabbi [Yehudah HaNasi]. Rabban Shimon Ben Gamliel says: He cannot cancel it, nor can he add a condition [to the get], for if [he were able to do] so, how would we affirm the authority of [Rabban Gamliel's] court, [if his enactment carries no consequences].'"

The Gemara raises a question about Rabban Shimon ben Gamliel's reasoning: "Is there a case where by Torah law a get would be void, and because of the argument 'how would we affirm the court's authority', we permit a married woman to [marry anyone else in] the world?" The Gemara answers that indeed it is possible for the Rabbis to validate a get that is invalid by Torah law, "for whoever betroths [a woman] betroths [her] with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval. Hence the Rabbis have the authority to cancel his betrothal. Ravina said to Rav Ashi: Granted in the case where he betrothed her with money. But what is there to say if he betrothed her with sexual intercourse? [The Gemara declares that even in such an instance,] the Rabbis have the authority to declare his intercourse an act of prostitution." This passage appears once again in Yebamot 90b, in the context of a discussion regarding the Sages' authority to abrogate a Torah law. The Rishonim rule in accordance with the view of Rabbi Yehudah HaNasi (Rambam, Hilkhot Gerushin 6:16).

2. Gittin 73a discusses the case of a man on his deathbed who gave his wife a get and then recovered.

Jewish law prescribes that if a dying person instructs that a gift be given to a certain individual, the gift is valid at the time of his death, and no formal act of acquisition is required. But if the dying man recovers, he may retract the gift (Rambam, Hilkhot Zekhiyah 8:14). The Amoraim disagree about a get given by a dying man. Rav Huna maintains that his get is like his gift, so that if he recovers, the get is no longer valid, for we presume that he granted the divorce assuming that he would die, which is no longer the reality. But "Rabbah and Rava do not agree with Rav Huna." Rather, they maintain that the get is valid, not because of some basic legal principle, but "lest people say that a get is valid [even if it is given] after [the husband's] death".²¹ The Gemara raises a question about the position of Rabbah and Rava: "Is there a case where by Torah law a get is void, and because of a decree we permit a married woman to the world?" The Gemara answers in the affirmative, arguing that "whoever betroths [a woman] betroths [her] with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval, and the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal." The law is in accordance with Rabbah and Rava (Rambam, Hilkhhot Gerushin 9:16,18).

3. Ketubot 3a deals with the case of a husband who gave his wife a conditional get, but the condition was fulfilled only because of circumstances beyond his control. For example, a husband set out on a trip, and – for his wife's protection – gave her a get on condition that he not return home within a specified time. Even though he planned to be home on time, he was prevented from doing so, because it was impossible to cross a river that separated him from his house.

According to the first and Halakhically accepted version of Rava's position, there is no claim of "unavoidable interference" (ones) regarding a get, and so the get is valid. The Gemara explains that even though Torah law recognizes the validity of the claim of unavoidable interference (ones rahamana patrei), the Rabbis declared that in our case there is no such claim "because of virtuous women and because of licentious women". Simply explained, no virtuous woman would ever remarry on the basis of such a conditional get, because she would always fear lest an unavoidable interference had prevented her husband's return. The Gemara asks: "And because of virtuous women and licentious women we permit a woman who is [still] married [by Torah law] to [marry anyone else in] the world?" The Gemara answers yes, for "whoever betroths [a woman] betroths [her] with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval, and the Rabbis have the authority to cancel his betrothal." The law is in accordance with the view that there is no claim of unavoidable interference regarding a get (Tosafot, ad loc., s.v. ikka, in the name of Rabbenu Hananel; Rambam, Hilkhhot Gerushin 9:8, and Mishneh Lemelekh).

The two passages dealing with hafka'ah at the time of betrothal:

1. Bava Batra 48b deals with the case of a man who unfairly used his authority or power to coerce a woman into accepting his betrothal.

The Amoraim disagree: "Amemar said: If a man coerced [a woman] into accepting his betrothal, his betrothal is valid. Mar bar Rav Ashi said: In the case of a woman [who was so coerced], the betrothal is certainly not valid." Even though by Torah law the betrothal in such a case would be valid, "he acted improperly, and so they acted improperly toward him, and the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal." The law follows this last opinion (Rambam, Hilkhhot Ishut 4:1; see Maggid Mishneh, ad loc.: "This is the conclusion in Bava Batra, that Rav Ashi said that he acted improperly ... and the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal").

2. Yebamot 110a deals with the case of an individual who snatched a woman away from another man who had first claim to her.

A case arose in Naresh in which a man betrothed a minor, such a betrothal being valid only by Rabbinic law. When she reached adulthood (twelve), the husband brought his young bride under a bridal canopy so that the betrothal be valid by Torah law. As she was about to enter the huppah, another man came, snatched her away, and betrothed her. Even though by Torah law the second husband's betrothal is valid, for she accepted his betrothal, "Rav Bruna and Rav Hananel, disciples of Rav, were there, and did not require [the woman to receive] a get from the second one. ... Rav Ashi said: He acted improperly, and so they acted improperly toward him, and the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal." Even though this law was not explicitly codified by Rambam or the Shulhan Arukh, it is cited by a number of Rishonim (see, for example Rashba, Responsa, I, 1206, who cites this passage).

Jerusalem Talmud

The Jerusalem Talmud cites only one case of hafka'at kiddushin in connection with a husband who cancelled a get after sending it to his wife via an agent (Gittin 4:2). It would appear from that discussion that hafka'ah is based on the authority invested in the Sages to uproot a Torah law. It would also appear that the Jerusalem Talmud rules that the Sages have the authority to uproot a Torah law, even in an active manner, unlike the conclusion of the Babylonian Talmud (Yebamot 90b).

Views of the Geonim and Rishonim regarding Hafka'at Kiddushin

The following points must be clarified when analyzing the views of the legal authorities to be cited below:

1. What is hafka'at kiddushin? What is the mechanism through which a marriage may be cancelled?
2. What is the result of hafka'at kiddushin? Is the marriage cancelled retroactively, or only from the time of cancellation?
3. Who is invested with the authority to cancel a marriage? Did this authority come to an end at the close of the Talmudic period?
4. In which cases may a marriage be cancelled? Only in the cases mentioned explicitly in the Talmud, or in other cases as well?
5. Is there a distinction between hafka'ah at the time of betrothal and hafka'ah at some later point, e.g., at the time of divorce?

As was mentioned earlier, the Gemara cites five cases of hafka'at kiddushin. The three passages dealing with hafka'ah implemented at some later point after the betrothal mention the principle that a man betroths his wife with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval. The two passages dealing with hafka'ah at the time of betrothal make no mention of that principle. In its place we find the idea that "he acted improperly, and so they acted improperly toward him." It is clear that when the hafka'ah takes effect at the time of betrothal, a get is not required. As we shall see regarding those cases where the hafka'ah takes place at some later point the Rishonim disagree whether or not a get is required, and whether that get must be valid by Torah law or even by Rabbinic decree. The question arises: What is the relation between the two types of hafka'ah, or in other words, is hafka'ah at the time of betrothal also based on the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval, or not? The answer to this question has profound Halakhic ramifications, for if the two types of hafka'ah share the same basis, we may infer or extrapolate certain laws from one to the other. For example, were we to conclude that the authority to cancel a marriage at the time of betrothal remained in force even after the close of the Talmudic period, then it might follow that the same may be said about hafka'ah at some later point. Similarly, it might be argued that in the same way that a get is not required for hafka'ah at the time of betrothal, so too enactments may be instituted allowing for the cancellation of a marriage even at some later date, and even without a get.

Rashi and his Super-Commentaries – Every Betrothal is Conditional on Rabbinic Approval

In order to understand the Halakhic foundation of hafka'at kiddushin, let us carefully analyze the words of Rashi (1040-1105) in his commentary to the various passages dealing with the topic. At first glance, his position appears to be rather consistent, and based upon the principle that the marital formula makes every betrothal dependent upon rabbinic approval. Nevertheless, alternate explanations of his view have been suggested.

We will cite here a section of Rashi's commentary to Ketubot 3a:

"Whoever betroths' – whoever betroths a woman betroths her according to the understandings instituted by the Sages of Israel in Israel that the betrothal take effect and remain in effect in accordance with the words of the Sages and that the betrothal be invalidated in accordance with the words of the Sages by means of a get validated by the Sages.

'And the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal' – when it is followed by a get like this.

'Granted' – that you can say the betrothal is cancelled when he betrothed her with money, for you can say that this get nullifies the betrothal and transforms the money retroactively into a gift.

'If he betrothed her with sexual intercourse, what' – retroactive cancellation is there? Granted when there is a valid get, even though the betrothal was in effect until now, the Torah declares that the get severs [the marital bond] and permits that which had been forbidden from now on. But this which is not a get by Torah law, and you validate it because of his understanding that he betrothed her with the assumption that his act has Rabbinic approval, and therefore it may be cancelled by those very Rabbis – you must say that it was not a betrothal from the very beginning. And if he had betrothed her with sexual intercourse, and you nullify his betrothal retroactively, what happens to his act of sexual intercourse?

'The Rabbis declared his intercourse' – an act of prostitution retroactively because of a get which is valid by Rabbinic decree. And they have the authority to do this, for he relied upon them."

Rashi clearly maintains that the hafka'ah works retroactively (s.v., "granted" - this get nullifies the betrothal and transforms the money retroactively into a gift; s.v., "if he betrothed her" – and the nullification of the Sages is retroactive, as if there had never been a betrothal; and similarly s.v., "the Rabbis declared" - retroactively by way of the get). But what is the Halakhic basis for canceling a betrothal?

The usual interpretation of the super-commentaries is that according to Rashi, hafka'at kiddushin is based on a set condition always and automatically attached to the betrothal.²² Whenever a man betroths a woman he conditions his betrothal on Rabbinic approval. The Jewish Sages as a whole act as silent partners in his betrothal, and the validity of the betrothal depends upon their consent. Even though Rashi doesn't mention the term "condition" (tenai) explicitly, this seems to be how he interprets the established betrothal formula: "You are hereby betrothed to me in accordance with the laws of Moses and Israel." Hence, Rashi writes: "Whoever betroths a woman betroths her according to the understandings instituted by the Sages of Israel in Israel that the betrothal take effect and remain in effect in accordance with the words of the Sages and that the betrothal be invalidated in accordance with the words of the Sages by means of a get validated by the Sages." And similarly we find in Rashi's commentary to Gittin 33a: "He betroths her with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval – that his betrothal should take effect in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel instituted by the Sages of Israel, and surely they said that any betrothal in Israel should be cancelled with such a get. Therefore the betrothal is nullified, for he betrothed her with that understanding." And so too we find in Rashi's commentary to Yebamot 110a: "And they cancelled his betrothal – for whoever betroths [a woman] relies on the approval of the Sages, for we say 'in accordance with the laws of Moses and Israel.'" ²³

According to this understanding of Rashi's position that hafka'at kiddushin is based on our conditional betrothal formula, the get is not needed to implement the hafka'ah. Similarly, according to this view that hafka'ah is based on the conditional betrothal formula, there is no need to say that the authority to cancel a marriage ended with the close of the Talmudic period. So too there is room to say that new enactments and practices may be instituted regarding marriage and divorce, and that hafka'at kiddushin is not limited to the cases mentioned in the Gemara. And furthermore it may be argued that Rashi does not distinguish between hafka'ah implemented at the time of betrothal and hafka'ah implemented at some later point. After all, in the Yebamot (110a) passage dealing with hafka'ah at the time of betrothal, the Gemara does not mention the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval. Nonetheless Rashi in his commentary to that passage does cite that principle to explain that hafka'ah as well. ²⁴ Thus, it may be argued that just as there is no need for a get when the hafka'ah is implemented at the time of betrothal, so too it may be possible to cancel a marriage at some later point without a get. ²⁵

Shittah Mekubbetzet's Interpretation of Rashi

Shittah Mekubetzet (R. Betzalel Ashkenazi, 1520-1591) on Ketubot (3a) understands Rashi's position in a completely different manner, insisting that without a get, there is no room for hafka'ah after the time of the betrothal itself. According to the Shittah, when the Gemara says that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, it does not mean that the husband conditions his betrothal on that approval, akin to a person who betroths a woman on condition that his father approves. If that were the case, then when the Sages deny their approval, there would not be any need for a get. Rather, Rashi maintains that a person wants his betrothal to be absolute and unconditional, but that betrothal may be cancelled by a get that is declared valid by the Rabbis. According to this, a distinction must be made between hafka'ah at the time of betrothal and later hafka'ah. If the husband acts improperly at the time of betrothal, his betrothal is not valid, for the Sages declare his property ownerless (invalidating the betrothal money), and his sexual intercourse an act of prostitution. When the hafka'ah is implemented at some later point, the marriage can only be cancelled by a get that is valid at the very least by Rabbinic decree. ²⁶

Other Rishonim who See Every Betrothal Conditional to Rabbinic Approval

While there may be a certain ambiguity in Rashi's position, because he does not use the term tenai (condition) outright, other Rishonim state clearly that hafka'at kiddushin is based on a condition. We will cite here just a few of them:

R. Aaron Halevi (1235-1300), Ketubot 3a, s.v., "is there a case": "It may be asked: Since we say 'whoever betroths a woman betroths her with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval', why mention money or intercourse? Surely he is like [someone who says] 'on condition that Father approves,' and he didn't approve." And later he writes: "Since he betrothed her with the understanding of their approval, it is as if he said, 'on condition that Father approves'."

Ritva (R. Yom Tov b. Abraham, 1258-1330), Ketubot 3a, s.v., "whoever betroths": "(Even though²⁷) [therefore] he says, 'in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel'. Thus it is as if he stipulated 'on condition that the Sages approve.'"²⁸ And similarly s.v. veafkinhu: "He is like someone who said 'You are betrothed to me on condition that Father approves'."

Rabbi Abraham son of Rambam (1186-1237), She'eilot Uteshuvot Birkat Avraham, no. 44: "You can apply here the principle that whoever betroths a woman betroths her with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, and it is like a condition attached to the betrothal."

Maharam of Rothenburg (1215-1293) cited in Mordekhai, Kiddushin, chap. 3, no. 522, regarding a case where a man betrothed a woman, and at the time the betrothal was valid: "At the time of betrothal he did nothing wrong, and we judge him according to that time, and say that he betrothed her on condition that if he later violates a Rabbinic regulation ... his betrothal will not be valid."

The Dissenters

On the other hand, there are Rishonim who raised objections against the principle of hafka'at kiddushin in general, and against Rashi's understanding that the hafka'ah takes effect retroactively, in particular. After all, if a marriage can be cancelled retroactively because of unavoidable interference or cancellation of a get, then whenever a woman commits adultery – so that the woman is forbidden to her husband and lover, she and her lover are liable for the death penalty, and any child born from that relationship is a mamzer – all the husband has to do is send a get to his wife through an agent and then cancel the get, or attach to the get a condition that is likely to lead to unavoidable interference. Once this is done, then the marriage will retroactively be cancelled, his wife will retroactively be considered a single woman, and she and her children will be saved from all the penalties of her adultery. This objection led a number of Rishonim to a totally different understanding of hafka'at kiddushin.

Rashbam argues that the Gemara does not mean to say that a valid betrothal that had already been in effect can be cancelled retroactively. Rather the marriage is cancelled from the time of cancellation on, and by way of the get, which is valid by Torah law. A person does not want the Rabbis to declare his sexual intercourse acts of prostitution, and so, when he divorces his wife, he gives her a get in such a way that the Rabbis will not cancel his marriage. In other words, from the outset he waives all claims of unavoidable interference, and cancels all future cancellations of the get. In those cases where the Rabbis cancelled a betrothal even without a get (Yebamot and Bava Batra) the husband acted improperly at the time of betrothal. Since a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, if he betroths her in an improper manner against the Rabbis' wishes, the betrothal never takes effect, and the woman is free to leave even without a get. But if a man betroths a woman in the proper manner in accordance with the Rabbis' directives, the betrothal can only be terminated by way of a get that is valid by Torah law.

Ri Halavan (Rabbi Yitzhak the son of Rabbi Ya'akov of Boehm, a disciple of Rabbenu Tam) adds that just as we say that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, so too he divorces her with a similar understanding. Thus, whenever a man divorces his wife, he is considered as if he had stipulated at the time of the divorce that even if there is unavoidable interference and even if he cancels the get, the get will still be valid. Ri Halavan agrees with Rashbam that once we are into a marriage, that is, the betrothal has taken effect, then the marriage can only be terminated with a get that is valid by Torah law. Thus, the positions of Rashbam and Ri Halavan do not advance the possibility of canceling a marriage when the husband refuses to give his wife a get.

Rabbenu Tam and Ri (R. Isaac b. Samuel, d. 1185) propose alternate solutions to the difficulties raised above. While they do not actually get into the question of how hafka'ah works, it would appear that they maintain that hafka'at kiddushin does work retroactively. They explain that for various different reasons we are not concerned that the husband will take advantage of hafka'at kiddushin in order to protect his adulterous wife or to legitimize mamzerim. According to Ri, hafka'at kiddushin is applied in accordance with clearly formulated criteria set by the Rabbis, without considering the circumstances of a particular case. Rabbenu Tam argues that the implementation of hafka'ah requires the decision of a court, and if the court sees that the husband is trying to protect his adulterous wife or permit mamzerim, it will not cancel his marriage. In any case, Rabbenu Tam and Ri reject Rashbam's conclusion that once a man betroths a woman in the proper manner, the betrothal can only be terminated with a get that is valid by Torah law.

Other Rishonim agree with Rashbam that after a betrothal takes effect with Rabbinic sanction, it cannot be cancelled without a get, but they argue that the get need not be valid by Torah law. They too distinguish between hafka'ah at the time of betrothal and hafka'ah at some later point. For example, Ri Migash (1077-1141) (Ketubot 3a) states explicitly that a distinction must be made between the two types of hafka'ah. When the husband betroths his wife in an improper manner, the woman leaves even without a get. But whenever he betroths her in a proper manner, and for whatever reason the marriage is later cancelled, the woman requires some sort of get (get kol dehu).²⁹ A similar distinction was made by Ramban, Re'ah, and Rashba (Ketubot, ad loc).

Rashba (R. Shlomo b. Abraham Ibn Adret, 1235-1310) was asked about the case where a man was seen drowning in "water having no end," but nobody actually saw that he died. Why didn't the Rabbis cancel the man's marriage in such a case, and thus permit his wife to remarry? He explains that "the Rabbis did not cancel marriages with nothing at all, but only in cases like this where there is some sort of get. Or else where a single witness testifies that the husband died." But this only applies to hafka'ah implemented at some later point. When, however, a marriage is cancelled at the time of betrothal, a get is not required, "because the betrothal itself lacked Rabbinic approval, for the husband acted in an improper manner".

It may be noted that the case of a man who had been seen drowning in "water having no end" does not pose any real difficulty to those who maintain that hafka'at kiddushin may be implemented even without any get whatsoever. In that case, the Sages did not want to cancel the marriage, for the husband may indeed still be alive and may one day return, expecting to find his wife waiting for him. But in those cases where the Rabbis did in fact cancel a marriage, a get may not be necessary.

Meiri

Menahem Ha-Meiri (1249-1316) (Ketubot 3a) states explicitly that hafka'at kiddushin does not require a get: "That which [the Rabbis] said that they cancelled a betrothal – not only in case like this where there is a get, but by right it is not valid, but rather even in a case where there is no get at all." Meiri explains why here in Ketubot and Gittin, a get is required, whereas in Yebamot and Bava Batra, a get is not required: "Here (in Ketubot) the hafka'ah stems from the doubt which arose regarding the get." The implication is that there is no essential difference between hafka'ah implemented at the time of betrothal and hafka'ah implemented at some later point, hafka'ah without a get being possible in both cases.

Meiri's comment in Yebamot (89b) is particularly relevant to our discussion: "We already explained in our commentary to the Mishnah that a court can only abrogate a Torah law in one of three ways: By declaring that the Torah law be abrogated in a passive manner; by declaring a person's property ownerless; or by proclaiming a temporary abrogation, thus constructing a fence safeguarding the Torah law. Any instance involving matrimonial law is not regarded as an abrogation, for a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, and they have the authority to cancel a marriage." Meiri implies that hafka'at kiddushin is not based on declaring the husband's property ownerless. Rather, it is based on a specific authority given to the Rabbis in matters of marriage and divorce. There is no reason to say that this authority does not obtain today. Meiri's position may be based on the Jerusalem Talmud cited earlier.

Rambam

It should be noted that Rambam does not make a single reference to the principle of hafka'at kiddushin. But he codifies all the Talmudic rulings that the Gemara associates with that principle, except for one (Yebamot 110a). The absence of any reference to hafka'at kiddushin on the part of Rambam led R. Nahum Rabinowitz³⁰ to the conclusion that Rambam agrees with Rashbam and Ri Halavan, thus obviating the need to mention the aforementioned principle.³¹ But it would seem to me that this argument is inconclusive, for as was mentioned above, Rambam does in fact codify all the Talmudic rulings based on the principle of hafka'at kiddushin. And Yad Malakhi cites the following principle (Kelalei HaRambam, no. 2): "It is well known that Rambam ... mostly copies the Gemara. A matter that is cited in the Gemara as an objection, or 'by the way' – it is not his way to copy ... for Rambam only includes in his work that which is explained frontally in the Gemara." Regarding hafka'at kiddushin, both points raised by the Yad Malakhi as to when Rambam does not copy the Gemara are present. The principle is cited in the Gemara by the way as part of an answer to an objection. Moreover the principle is not explained in the Gemara, but only by the Rishonim. Thus, it is no wonder that

Rambam omitted this principle. Moreover, we have already seen that his teacher Ri Migash cites the principle, and explains it in a manner inconsistent with the view of Rashbam. And furthermore, Rambam's son explains his father's position at the beginning of Hilkhhot Ishut as based on hafka'at kiddushin.³²

Hafka'at Kiddushin after the Talmudic Period – the Power of Communal Enactments

Over the generations there were many attempts to apply the principle of hafka'at kiddushin to cases that were not mentioned explicitly in the Gemara. Most of the discussions relate to cases that became known as "secret marriages" or "deceptive marriages". By law, when a man gives a woman a ring or some other object of value in the presence of two witnesses, and says to her, "You are betrothed to me in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel", they are man and wife. No additional formal ceremony is required. But in order to avert disputes between the parties and prevent any doubts from arising as to the validity of the marriage, enactments were instituted in many communities that introduced formality and publicity into the marriage ceremony. Among other things, these enactments required that the betrothal take place in the presence of ten people or before the community's Rabbi or communal heads, that the betrothal have the parents' blessings, that a ketubah be written, and that the betrothal take place at the time of the huppah. The question arose as to the validity of a marriage that took place in defiance of these enactments, "secretly" or "in a deceptive manner". The Rabbis disagreed about whether or not such marriages could be cancelled. Some argued that even after the close of the Talmudic period, the authority to cancel marriages remained in the hands of the Rabbinic authorities of each generation, while others denied them that privilege. Some restricted the possibility of canceling a marriage to those cases in which the sanction of hafka'at kiddushin was mentioned explicitly in the enactment. Others argued that while the authority to cancel marriages still exists in theory, for various reasons it should not be exercised in practice. Over the course of time, the readiness to utilize the authority to cancel a marriage continued to decline. Nevertheless, there were significant instances after the Talmudic period where Rabbis in various communities did invoke hafka'at kiddushin to resolve problems that arose in their day.

Geonic Period

Already in the days of the Geonim, there was a difference of opinion as to whether or not the Rabbis retained their authority to cancel a marriage after the close of the Talmudic period. In a responsum dealing with the marriage ceremony (cited in Otzar Geonim, Ketubot, p. 18, no. 60), Rav Hai Gaon (939-1038) cited an enactment in the name of his grandfather, Rabbenu Yehudah Gaon: "And our grandfather, our Master and Rabbi Yehudah Gaon, enacted for them that betrothals only take place in accordance with the Babylonian practice, with a ketubah, and the signature of witnesses, and the betrothal blessings. As for a betrothal that does not follow this practice, he enacted that we do not concern ourselves with it, as they said (Ketubot 3a): Whoever betroths a woman betroths her with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, and the Rabbis cancelled his betrothal. So too it is fitting that you put this into practice." Rav Hai Gaon and Rav Yehudah Gaon were clearly of the opinion that the authority to cancel a marriage did not end with the close of the Talmud, and that the possibility of canceling a marriage is not limited to the cases mentioned in the Gemara. It is difficult to infer what they maintain about the other points raised earlier.

In contrast, the R. Yosef Karo writes in a responsum (She'eilot Uteshuvot Bet Yosef, no. 10) that he saw a responsum of one of the Geonim who argued "that we only say that the Rabbis cancelled a marriage where they [actually] said so."³³ It is obvious that according to that opinion, the authority to cancel a marriage terminated with the closing of the Talmudic period.

We have seen that Rav Hai Gaon and Rav Yehudah Gaon accepted the possibility of canceling a marriage on the basis of an explicit enactment, although there may have been other Geonim who disagreed. At the end of the twelfth century, a disagreement arose between the Rabbis of Worms and Speyer, on the one hand, and the Rabbis of Mainz, on the other hand, as to whether or not hafka'at kiddushin could be implemented in a case where there was no prior enactment governing the matter. Raban (Sefer Raban, Prague ed., p. 283) cites an incident that occurred in Cologne, where "a young man was trying to arrange a marriage with the parents of his prospective bride. In the meantime another man of means arranged the match and [the parents] agreed to the marriage, the father agreeing to accept the betrothal of the second suitor. They called for the community [to assemble] in accordance with the custom. When the second suitor stood up to go and betroth her, the relatives of the first suitor went ahead in a guile manner, and betrothed her in the presence of witnesses that they had prepared. When the [bride's] parents realized [what had happened], they said to her: Throw away the betrothal [ring] in your hand, and she did so, and the second suitor betrothed her on that same occasion." Rabbi Ya'akov Halevi of Worms and Rabbi Yitzhak Halevi of Speyer wished to cancel the first marriage without a get, on the basis of the Yebamot passage dealing with the incident that occurred in Naresh, where a man acted in a similarly improper manner and snatched a woman as his wife: "So too did the first suitor (act improperly when he) snatched her from the second suitor to whom she had been designated, and betrothed her. Let us cancel the betrothal." But the Sages of Mainz, Rabbi Elyakim, and Rabbi Ya'akov Halevi, and Raban himself, rejected their arguments: "[Even] if the [Talmudic] Rabbis had the authority to cancel a marriage, we do not have the authority to do so." In other words, the post-Talmudic Rabbinic authorities no longer have the authority to cancel a marriage. Raban seems to imply that even in those cases that the Talmud says we implement hafka'at kiddushin, e.g., where a condition attached to a get was fulfilled because of unavoidable interference, today we would no longer cancel the marriage.³⁴

Rashba

Rashba (She'eilot Uteshuvot, no. 1185) was asked about a betrothal that was conducted in the presence of witnesses who by Rabbinic decree are disqualified to testify: does such a betrothal requires a get, or not? He rejects Alfasi's argument that in such a case we should invoke the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval, and therefore cancel the marriage. He argues that "this principle does not apply to all cases regarding which the Sages said not to act in a certain manner, so that if he acts in that matter, his act has no validity. In all these matters, you only have what the Rabbis permitted explicitly." It would, however, be wrong to infer from what

Rashba says that the Rabbis lack the authority to institute new enactments that would allow for the cancellation of a marriage. Rashba was in fact asked in another responsum (1206) about a community that enacted a decree forbidding a man to betroth a woman in the presence of less than ten people; if he should do so, his betrothal is invalid. He writes: "By right, it is clear to me that the townspeople are permitted to act in that manner, provided that the residents agree. But if there is a Torah scholar who disagrees with them, they may not do so. The reason is that the community may declare the husband's money ownerless, and so it turns out that he betrothed his wife with money that was not his. As they said in the Talmud, 'The Rabbis cancelled his betrothal.'" At the end of his responsum, he concludes: "There was such an incident in our city, and I discussed the matter before our Rabbis, and my master, Rabbi Moshe bar Nahman agreed with me." But he concludes with a certain qualification: "But the matter still requires further consideration."

And similarly Rashba writes in another responsum (551): "If the communities as a whole or each community individually wish to institute an enactment to protect against such mishaps, they should make an enactment in the presence of all, and declare as absolutely ownerless any money given to any woman in the community, unless she received it with her consent and her father's consent, or in the presence of a certain person as they wish. And I found that Rav Sherira Gaon and his ancestors acted in this way, and told the community to act in this way." Here Rashba does not conclude with the qualification that the matter requires further consideration.

Rashba's position as outlined above seems to be contradicted by what he himself writes in yet another responsum (no. 550) regarding a city in which an enactment was passed that a man may only betroth a woman in the presence of ten people and the congregational leader, and that someone who violates the enactment is liable to excommunication and a monetary fine. Rashba rules that even if a woman was betrothed in a manner inconsistent with the enactment, she still needs a get, for we do not cancel her betrothal on account of the enactment. However, it may be suggested that the difference lies in the formulation of the enactment.³⁵ In the first two enactments (1206, 551), it was stipulated explicitly in the text of the enactment that if someone betroths a woman not in accordance with the terms of the enactment, his betrothal will not be valid. If such a stipulation was included in the enactment, the betrothal is not valid, but if no such stipulation was made, the betrothal is valid.

Rosh

R. Asher b. Yehiel (1250-1327) (She'eilot Uteshuvot, section 35, no. 1) was asked whether or not a court can legislate that if a man betroths a woman without her parents' consent, the court may declare the betrothal money as ownerless and the betrothal invalid. Rosh writes that in addition to the argument that a court can at any time declare money as ownerless, a man always betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, "and in every generation a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has the approval of the Sages of the generation who make enactments to serve as safeguards, and with the understanding that his betrothal will only be valid if it is conducted in accordance with their enactments." Thus, Rosh too allows for hafka'at kiddushin after the Talmud in accordance with contemporary Rabbinic enactments.

Rivash - Hafkaah, but with the consent of the Rabbis of the Region

The first sign of a change in attitude regarding hafka'at kiddushin – in which the theoretical principle is accepted, but the practical implementation is questioned – may be found in a responsum of Rivash (R. Isaac b. Sheshet, 1326-1408) (no. 799). Rivash was asked about a community that enacted that a man may only betroth a woman with the knowledge of the community's trustees, and in their presence, and in the presence of ten people. A betrothal conducted in any other manner is declared invalid, and the money or object of value given for the betrothal is declared ownerless. Rivash argues that since the community can declare as ownerless the money of those who violate their enactments, if the community stipulated that when someone betroths a woman without the knowledge and in the absence of the community's trustees, his money is declared ownerless, it is obvious that such a betrothal is invalid. In such a case, we do not even have to invoke the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his betrothal has Rabbinic approval. That principle is only needed in a case where the betrothal was valid, and the Sages wish to validate a get that by Torah law is invalid. If, however, the man betrothed the woman by way of sexual intercourse, we must invoke the principle that betrothals are conducted with the understanding that they have Rabbinic approval. Even if it were necessary to invoke that principle in all cases of hafka'at kiddushin, it might still be argued that in the same way that we say that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, so too he betroths her with the understanding that he has the community's approval. At the end of the responsum, Rivash writes that in theory, "if a man betroths a woman in violation of the community's enactment, his betrothal is invalid, and she does not require a get." "But in practice I would lean towards stringency, and not rely on my opinion in the matter – on account of the severity of the issue of releasing a woman without a get – without the approval of all the Sages of the different regions." Rivash does not reject the possibility of canceling a marriage that was conducted in violation of a communal enactment. But he hesitates to use the authority granted to the Torah scholars of every generation, as well as to the community, and requires the agreement of all the sages in the area in order to utilize that authority.

Rashbatz and Rashbash - Hafkaah, Theoretical Rather Than Applied Law

Rabbi Shimon the son of Rabbi Tzemah Duran (1361-1444) (Tashbetz II, no. 5) was asked about "a community that enacted that if someone betroths a woman without the knowledge of the city council and the communal elders, his betrothal is invalid." He rules that according to the letter of the law every court and every community in every generation is authorized to cancel a marriage. "This is what appears from the law itself. But because of the severity of matrimonial law, we should be concerned that perhaps we require a court like the court of Rabbi Ami and Rabbi Asi ... even so in matters of marriage we should be stringent ... and moreover it was not explicitly stated in the enactment that they would declare the money ownerless. And so we have heard that the ruling was never put into actual practice."

Rashbatz issues a similar ruling in another responsum (I, no. 133): "Whatever I say on this matter is merely theoretical. For authorities have already been asked about this matter many times, and we do not find that they put this ruling into practice."

A similar approach was adopted by Rashbatz's grandson, Rabbi Shimon the son of Rabbi Shlomo Duran (1438-1510) (Yakhin Uboaz, II, no. 46). After Rashbash distinguishes between hafka'ah at the time of betrothal and hafka'ah at some later point, and between the various different formulations of the communal enactments, he adds: "Even if the enactment would be formulated in this manner, it should not be acted upon. The great authorities have already testified as follows: 'And so we have heard that the ruling was never put into actual practice.' Now if the early authorities testify about the even earlier authorities that they never acted upon such an enactment ... then how is it possible that we should do so."

Maharik - Hafkaah, But Only on the Basis of an Explicit Enactment

Maharik (R. Joseph Colon, 1420-1480) (no. 84) received information (that later proved to be false) that the rabbi of Constantinople, Rabbi Moshe Capsali, released without a get a woman who had been betrothed with a fig in the presence of two witnesses. Among the other arguments, it was claimed that the aforementioned rabbi had already placed a ban on anybody who betroths a woman in the presence of less than ten people. Since the man betrothed the woman in the presence of only two witnesses, his betrothal is not valid. Maharik issued an angry response to this ruling, arguing that a marriage cannot be cancelled on the basis of an enactment or a ban – not even if it was a communal enactment, and certainly not the enactment of a single rabbi. Shiltei Gibborim (Bava Batra, 45a in Rif) suggests that there is no contradiction between the position of Maharam and Maharik that a betrothal is valid, even if it was conducted in such a manner that violates an enactment, and between the position of Rashba that in such a case the betrothal is not valid (we have already noted that this apparent contradiction exists between the various responsa of Rashba himself). It all depends upon the formulation of the enactment. If it was stated that a man who betroths a woman in the presence of less than ten people, or the like, would be subject to a ban, and someone went ahead and violated the enactment, even though he is liable for a ban, his betrothal is valid. But if the enactment reads that if a man betroths a woman in the presence of less than ten people, his betrothal will not be valid, his betrothal is in fact not valid.

Maharam Alashkar - Hafkaah, But with the Requirement of a Regional Enactment

Maharam Alashkar (1466-1542) (no. 48) discusses a communal enactment declaring that a man may not betroth a woman in the presence of less than ten people or in the absence of the community's sage, and that any betrothal conducted in violation of this enactment will not be valid. He argues that according to Rav Hai, Rashba, Rosh, and Rivash, a community is permitted by right to enact such legislation. But he concludes that only if the enactment were passed with the agreement of the entire region and all or most of its Rabbinical authorities, would he follow in their footsteps and support the enactment. But if the enactment was that of only a single community, he would not rule leniently, for a man does not betroth a woman with the understanding that he has the approval of a particular community, but rather with the understanding that he has the approval of all the communities in the region. Regarding the particular case under discussion, Maharam Alashkar rules that the woman requires a get. But it follows from what he says that if the legislation had not been a mere local enactment, but rather it had the backing of all the communities in the region, then there would be room to invalidate any betrothal conducted in violation of that legislation. While hesitating in actual practice, Maharam Alashkar agrees that in theory the Rabbis of every generation have the authority to pass legislation allowing for a betrothal to be cancelled.

Rabbi Yosef Karo - A Turn Towards Stingency

Rabbi Yosef Karo (1488-1575) in his commentary on the Tur (Bet Yosef, Even HaEzer, end of chapter 28), cites the three responsa of Rashba, as well as the responsa of Rivash, Rashbatz, and Maharik cited above, regarding communal enactments relating to marriage, without adding any commentary. As we have seen, these reflect the possibility of hafkaah, but with an explicit enactment and the agreement of the regional Rabbinical authorities. The spirit of these responsa is to view hafkaah as a theoretical possibility which would be best not applied practically. In his Shulhan Arukh, he makes no mention of any of the issues raised in those responsa.

The matter is also treated in two of R. Karo's own responsa. In one place (She'eilot Uteshuvot Bet Yosef, no. 6), he sharply attacks a ruling concerning someone who violated a communal enactment forbidding a man to betroth a woman not in the presence of a court. According to that ruling, his betrothal was not valid. R. Karo accepts the view of Rivash that even if the enactment stipulated that the betrothal money would be declared ownerless, the woman may not be released without a get. All the more so is this true in the case before him where cancellation of the marriage was not mentioned in the enactment. Elsewhere (no. 10), he repeats his position and explains that "where they said [that the marriage is cancelled] they said so, and where they did not say [that the marriage is cancelled] they did not say so." In other words, hafka'at kiddushin is only implemented in those cases that are mentioned explicitly in the Gemara. Moreover, even if it is agreed that it is possible to cancel a marriage in other cases as well, "that only applies to them, and to the early generations who understood the reasons of things. But in these generations, who says that we have the authority to cancel marriages that are valid by Torah law."

Rema - Hafkaah is Theoretical but not Applied Law - Unless There is Great Need, For Which He Suggests a Stunning Precedent.

Rema (R. Moses Isserles, 1525-1572) writes in his strictures to the Shulhan Arukh (Even HaEzer, 28:21): "If a community enacted among themselves that anybody who betroths a woman in the presence of less than ten people, or the like, and someone went ahead and betrothed a woman in that manner, we are concerned about the betrothal and the woman needs a get. Even if the community expressly stipulated that the betrothal will not be valid, and declared his money ownerless – even so, one should be stringent in practice."

Rema's position seems to be quite clear: Even if it was stated explicitly that if someone violates the enactment, his betrothal would not be valid, a get is nevertheless required. But there is still room for a certain doubt. The editor who notes Rema's sources traces Rema's ruling to Maharik. But Maharik's ruling related to an enactment that did not explicitly mention hafka'at kiddushin. Thus, it is difficult to understand how his words can serve as a source for Rema's ruling. The editor might have made a mistake, and the true source for Rema's ruling is Rivash, and not Maharik. If so, just as Rivash said that he would join with other Rabbinic authorities if they would agree to release the woman without a get, so too Rema might agree to such a proposition.³⁶

The Stunning Precedent

Particularly interesting and important in the context of our discussion is Rema's view in his Darkhei Moshe (7, 13). Rema deals there with the lenient ruling (as cited by Terumat Hadeshen, no. 241) issued on behalf of the Jewish women taken captive during a period of persecution in Austria, which allowed them to return to their husbands. (The operative law is that such women are generally assumed to have had illicit relations during their captivity, and are therefore prohibited to return to their husbands; Even HaEzer 7:4). Rema writes: "It seems to me that the Rabbinic authorities may have issued their lenient ruling not on the basis of the strict law, but because of the needs of the hour. For they saw that there was reason to be concerned about what women might do in the future. For if they knew that they would not be permitted to the husbands of their youth, they might sin, and so [the Rabbis] were lenient. And don't say from where do we know that we might be lenient in a case that involves a possible Torah prohibition. It seems to me that they relied on that which they said that whoever betroths a woman betroths her with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, and the court is authorized to cancel his marriage, so they were like unmarried women, and even if they sinned, they are permitted to their husbands."

Obviously according to no less an authority than Rema, even today's Rabbinic authorities (that is to say, those living after the close of the Talmudic era) retain the authority to cancel a marriage that had once been valid - even without a get, and even without an explicit enactment empowering them to do so.

Precedents for Hafkaat Kiddushin in the Modern Period

Even though the tendency among the Halakhic authorities seemed to be to discourage the practical possibility of hafka'at kiddushin, enactments that included the provision of hafka'at kiddushin for those who violate those enactments continued to be passed into law until the beginning of the twentieth century. In a period of a little more than a hundred years (1804-1921), for example, no fewer than seven enactments allowing for the cancellation of marriages were instituted in various different countries – Italy, France, Algeria, and Egypt.³⁷ To illustrate the matter, let us examine the enactments instituted in Egypt. An acute form of the problem of "deceptive marriages" arose in Egypt, because the Jewish community included foreign nationals who enjoyed the protection of the major foreign powers. The Rabbis had once been able to force those who violated their enactments to give their wives a get, but this was no longer possible. In the year 1901, Rabbi Eliyahu Hazzan, chief Rabbi of Alexandria, headed a court which instituted enactments regarding the public character of the marriage ceremony. The court decided that anyone who violates those enactments - "his betrothal will be invalid, like a broken shard." That court made use of its authority to cancel marriages in theory and in actual practice.³⁸

Contemporary Approaches to Solve the Agunah Problem

Rabbi Kook (Ezrat Kohen, no. 70) discusses the possibility of appending hafka'ah to other arguments, in order to release a married woman without a get. He concludes that it is possible to include hafka'at kiddushin among other reasons for leniency, but one may not rely solely on that argument. This is also the position of Rabbi Ovadyah Yosef in a number of his responsa (Yabi'a Omer VII, no. 18, 7; IV, no. 5, 11).

Additionally, in the course of the last century, a number of attempts were made to resolve the agunah problem by attaching a condition to the betrothal and invoking the principle of hafka'at kiddushin. These attempts were based on the ancient enactment of Ri Brin (died in the year 1480), according to which a man with a heretic brother may betroth a woman, stipulating that if he dies and she falls before her late husband's brother for levirate marriage, the betrothal will not be valid (cited by Darkhei Moshe, Even HaEzer 157, no. 3, and Rema, Shulhan Arukh, Even HaEzer 157:4). In 1924 the court in Constantinople published a work entitled, "Conditional Marriage". The members of that court wished to attach a condition to all betrothals and marriages stating that if the husband leaves his wife for an extended period of time without her permission, or if he refuses to accept a court ruling, or if he takes ill with a mental or contagious disease – in all such cases the marriage is retroactively cancelled, and the woman does not need a get. Besides attaching a condition to the betrothal, the Constantinople court suggested invoking the principle of hafka'at kiddushin. Most of the leading Halakhic authorities rejected these proposals, and the Constantinople enactments were never put into actual practice.³⁹

In order to overcome some of the Halakhic difficulties with the Constantinople proposals, Rabbi Ben Zion Meir Hai Uziel (She'eilot Uteshuvot Mishpatei Uziel, Even HaEzer, no. 46) suggested another solution, according to which the husband should betroth his wife using the following formula: "You shall be betrothed to me with this ring for as long as no objections are raised during my lifetime and after my death by the court in this city, with the agreement of the district court or the state, and the decision of the court of the chief rabbinate of Israel in Jerusalem, and on account of a persuasive claim of causing my wife to be an agunah." But this proposal was also rejected by most of the generation's Rabbinic authorities. In addition to the specific Halakhic objections, it was argued that it is wrong to make every marriage conditional, for that would inevitably lead to a degradation of the sanctity of marriage.

In a theoretical discussion relating to present-day enactments concerning marriage, Rabbi Yitzhak Halevi Herzog writes as follows,⁴⁰ "And this might have Halakhic ramifications even in our day when the sages of the generation see that couples marry in civil courts ... and according to some opinions, as long as they live together afterwards openly as man and wife, she becomes his wife by Torah law, the sages of the generation should decree to uproot the marriage with the Torah authority invested in them ... Indeed it could be where the husband is obligated by Torah law to grant his wife a divorce, but he refuses to comply with the law, and the woman may have received a civil divorce in a non-Jewish court, but that does not help according to Torah law, and she remains an agunah forever. In such a case the court has the authority to uproot the betrothal, or to rule according to the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval. Even though Hazal did not cancel the marriage in such a case, that was because they were authorized to use physical force, or at least to impose a ban or excommunication, which is not the case in our day when these are forbidden."⁴¹

Summary

We have seen that many Rishonim (e.g., Rashi, according to most of his interpreters, R. Aharon HaLevi, Ritva, R. Abraham the son of Rambam, Maharam of Rothenburg, the Meiri and others) maintain that hafka'at kiddushin, even when implemented many years after the marriage, is based on an implied condition attached to the betrothal. According to this opinion, even when the Talmudic case-in-point involved a get, it was not the get that brought about the cancellation of the marriage, for in each instance the get was invalid by Torah law. Hence, there is reason to allow hafka'ah many years after the betrothal even without a get. According to this opinion there is no reason to say that the authority to cancel a marriage ended with the close of the Talmud, for the mechanism of the hafka'ah is built into the marriage formula which is still in practice to this very day.

We have also seen that throughout the ages – during the days of the Geonim, the Rishonim, and the Aharonim – the Sages of every generation used their authority to cancel marriages. Over time, the Rabbinic authorities hesitated more and more to invoke that authority, but they never gave it up altogether or doubted the possibility of executing it with a specific enactment of a Regional Court. Hafka'at kiddushin always remained a legitimate solution to pressing Halakhic problems. In times of need, and when no other Halakhic solution was available to them, the Rabbis continued to invoke their authority to cancel marriages even without a get. Enactments allowing for the cancellation of a marriage never stopped, as we have seen in the enactments passed in Egypt less than a hundred years ago.

The authority to cancel a marriage was usually invoked to cancel betrothals that had been conducted in an improper manner in violation of explicit communal enactments that had been instituted to prevent “secret” or “deceptive marriages”. But the option of canceling a marriage even after a valid betrothal, and even without an explicit enactment, was never completely ruled out either in cases of extreme necessity, as we have seen in Rema's explanation of the lenient ruling issued regarding women who had been taken captive during a period of persecution. According to Rema, the lenient ruling allowing such women to return to their husbands is based on the assumption that even today's Rabbis have the authority to cancel a marriage even without a get, and even though the couple had been living together as man and wife for many years. Rema justifies the ruling, emphasizing that it was issued because of “the needs of the hour”. The Rabbinic authorities ruled leniently because they were concerned that a more stringent approach would lead to sinful behavior in the future. These considerations are no less valid today than they were centuries ago in the time of Rema.

Conclusion

It is my opinion that in difficult times like today, when many women are forced to live as agunot chained to their husbands, and recalcitrant husbands are taking advantage of their pious wives as well as of their halakhic advantage to at best hold up their wives for ransom and at worst prevent them from marrying, there are certainly grounds to make use of the option of hafka'at kiddushin even without a get, but with an explicit enactment; this would release those women from their chains and from an almost certain life of sin. This is especially so when the problem of agunot causes such great human suffering and degradation of Halakhah. But this can only be done by a large gathering of the Rabbis of Israel who must decide on the matter, so that many authorities share the burden of the decision, and the Torah not become like two Torahs. Much thought is needed in order to carefully define the circumstances in which hafka'ah would be implemented, as well as to formulate the stipulation that would have to be added at the time of betrothal. My suggestion would be that the Chief Rabbinate in Jerusalem adopt an enactment stipulating that if a religious court orders a husband to divorce his wife, and he refuses to do so even after sanctions have been imposed upon him, then a special court should be established with the authority to cancel his marriage and free his wife to remarry.

There is little need to worry that allowing for the dissolution of a marriage without a get would lead to a devaluation of the sanctity of the institution of marriage. The proposed enactment would only apply in the most extreme cases of a recalcitrant husband. Moreover, it is likely that the actual implementation of hafka'at kiddushin will rarely be necessary. The mere threat of hafka'at kiddushin – and with it the release of the woman from her marital chains – would deprive the husband of the strangling hold that he has over his wife, and should suffice to convince him to free her from the marriage with a valid get.⁴² Tractate Yebamot closes with a statement made by Rabbi Elazar in the name of Rabbi Hanina: "Torah scholars increase peace in the world, as the verse states: 'And all of your children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of your children' - read not banayikh [your children], but rather bonayikh [your builders – Torah scholars are the true builders of peace]. Maharsha explains that tractate Yebamot ends with this passage, because the tractate contains many strange laws that appear to contradict and uproot that which is stated explicitly in the Torah. Rabbi Eliezer teaches that these laws were not taught in order to uproot the Torah, but rather to increase peace in the world, the peace that is engendered by healthy family life. The Gemara (in the parallel passage in Berakhot) then cites the verse, "Abundant peace have they who love Your Torah" – these laws bring abundant peace to the world, allowing a woman to free herself from her husband so that she not remain forever tied to him, as the verse states: 'Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and her pathways peace.' and a woman without a husband cannot live in peace. The Gemara ends with the verse, "The Lord will give strength to His people" – May God give the leaders of His people, the Torah scholars of every generation, the courage and strength to be lenient in these matters, and then surely "The Lord will bless His people with peace." May this be God's will.

Siyum

¹ R. Moses Sofer, Hiddushei HeHatam Sofer to Bava Batra 47b. But see Seridei Eish al HaShas, no. 11, who disagrees with the Hatam Sofer, arguing that betrothal cannot be likened to kinyan halifin: "The very fact that one can acquire a wife with a perutah proves that the [betrothal] money merely symbolizes the acquisition ... And for this reason a wife cannot be acquired by way of halifin, for a woman is not an object that can be bartered for another. Betrothal is a matter of prohibition and consecration, and the money symbolizes the acquisition. But halifin is an act of trade, exchanging one thing for another. This would be a disgrace for a woman, as mentioned by Rashi."

- ³ According to an alternative opinion cited there, the ketubah obligation is by Torah law, this being the meaning of the word mohar in Exodus 22:15; see also Rashi, ad loc. As for the normative Halakhah, whether the ketubah is a Torah law or only a Rabbinic enactment, see Rema, Even HaEzer, 66:6, and Bet Shmuel, note 14.
- ⁴ This is derived from what is stated in the verse (Deuteronomy 24:1): "And he shall write her a bill of divorce, and give it in her hand" (Rashbam, Bava Batra 48a, s.v., vekhen ata omer); or else from the beginning of that very verse: "That she find no favor in his eyes" (Rambam, Hilkhoh Gerushin 1:2).
- ⁵ As was mentioned above, following Rabbenu Gershom's enactment requiring the woman's free-will acceptance of her get, a man cannot divorce his wife against her will. But should a man seek a divorce and his wife refuse to accept her get, he has the option of obtaining a heter me'ah rabbanim, an allowance from a hundred Rabbis permitting him to take a second wife.
- ⁶ See Nedarim 90a: "Originally [the Sages] said: Three women are to be divorced [even against their husband's will] and are to receive their ketubah ... [One who says] 'Heaven is between you and me' {Rashi: the husband is impotent} ... The Sages then revised [their views] and said that a woman must not be [so easily given the opportunity] to look at another man and destroy her relationship with her husband." - ⁷ See Rambam, Hilkhoh Gerushin 2:20, who explains that the pressure applied to the husband uncovers his true desire to be a part of the Jewish people and do as he is commanded, and it is merely his evil inclination that overtakes him and prevents him from doing the right thing. See also R. Yitzhak Halevi Herzog, Heikhal Yitzhak (pt. I, no. 1, note 32), who explains that wherever the Mishnah or Talmud says that we force a divorce, it means that the Sages legislated a coerced divorce for the benefit of Jewish women, relying on the assumption that if the Rabbis order the husband to divorce his wife, the husband will agree to do so of his own free-will, for there is a mitzvah to obey the Rabbis.
- ⁸ Korban HaEidah understands that this stipulation was written in a separate contract drawn up prior to the huppah, whereas Penei Moshe explains that it was written into the ketubah itself.
- ⁹ See also Menahem HaMeiri, Ketubot, p. 269, no. 4, who argues that the Geonic decrees allowing for a forced divorce in the case of a woman who claims that she finds her husband repulsive, were based on the normative practice of inserting such a stipulation into the marriage contract.

D. Bleich) that she claims better protect the interests of Jewish women.
- ¹² Cited by Rosh, Ketubot, chapter 5, no. 34. According to Shiltei Gibborim (Ketubot 27a in Alfasi) in the name of Semag, and also Shitah Mekubbetzet, this is also the view of Rashi.
- ¹³ Bah (Even HaEzer 77, s.v., od) understands that Rambam inferred as follows: "Since the Gemara says: But if she says, 'I find him repulsive,' we do not force her, this implies that it is only the woman whom we do not force, but the man we force. For if not, the Gemara should have said: But if she says, 'I find him repulsive,' we do not deduct from her ketubah. Why mention forcing, if not for this inference?" See also R. Yitzhak Halevi Herzog, Heikhal Yitzhak (pt. 1, no. 2, note 1), who understands that according to Rambam, the husband is forced to divorce his wife by Talmudic law, and not only by Gaonic enactment. He proves this argument by pointing out that Rambam does not cite the reason offered by the Gaonim, that the husband is forced to divorce his wife, lest the woman come to a bad end, which is indeed a reason for an enactment. Rather Rambam states that a woman is not like a captive who must surrender to someone whom she hates, an argument that is not connected to any particular enactment or time period.

It should be noted that according to R. Feinstein, efforts must first be made to convince the husband to divorce his wife, and only if those efforts fail may the marriage be declared as having been based on an error.
- ¹⁹ R. Feinstein mentions this condition in a different responsum (Even Ha-Ezer, pt. 1, no. 179), regarding a retroactive stipulation attached to halitzah.
- ²⁰ This annulment procedure has been put into practice by the Beit Din LeBa'ayot Agunot, or Court for the Problems of Chained Women, a special court established in the United States by Rabbi Emanuel Rackman and Rabbi Moshe Morgenstern to solve difficult cases involving agunot. Though fiercely criticized by most of the Orthodox establishment, this court has to date dissolved the marriages of hundreds of Jewish couples.
- ²¹ And this will lead to the validation of a get in a case where the husband said, "This will be your get after I die," even though such a get is in fact invalid (see Gittin 13a and 72a), because a get cannot take effect after the husband's death. Were we to invalidate the get of a dying man after he recovers, people would say that the get is only valid if he dies, and come to validate a get that was only supposed to take effect after the husband's death (following Rashi).
- ²² See Hafla'ah, Ketubot 3a; Tiferet Ya'akov, Gittin 33a. Rabbi Z.H. Chajes (Gittin 33a) discusses the requirement of a "double-condition" (tenai kaful), and concludes that a "double-condition" is not needed here, because the condition is not attached to a physical act, but rather to a mere verbal statement. Following this line of reasoning, he explains that here the betrothal money must be declared ownerless, or his sexual intercourse must be declared an act of prostitution, in order to nullify the act of betrothal.
- ²³ According to this understanding of Rashi, two questions may indeed be raised: First, if we are dealing here with an ordinary condition, like "You are betrothed to me on condition that Father approves," why does the cancellation of the betrothal depend upon set rules "instituted by the Sages of Israel"? And second, if the betrothal is cancelled because of a condition that had been attached to it, why does Rashi repeatedly say that the betrothal is terminated by way of a get that was validated by the Rabbis?
- As for the first question, it might be suggested that when Rashi writes, "that his betrothal should take effect in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel instituted by the Sages of Israel," he means to explain the formula recited at the time of betrothal, "in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel." He understands that this refers to the practices put into effect by the Sages of Israel. The condition that allows for the cancellation of a marriage is, in fact, not equivalent to the condition, "on condition that Father approves." A marriage cannot be cancelled unless the husband violated a clear and well-known regulation that had been put into practice by the Sages.
- ²⁴ So too Rashbam (Bava Batra 48b) explains like Rashi in Yebamot that hafka'ah at the time of betrothal is based on the principle that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his act has Rabbinic approval.
- ²⁵ We already explained above (note 23) why, regarding the cases mentioned in the Gemara, Rashi requires that there be a get that is valid at least by Rabbinic decree. But it may still be possible to institute enactments that allow for the cancellation of a marriage even at some later date, and even without a get.
- ²⁶ Rabbi Eliezer Berkowitz (Tenai BeNissuim UveGet [Jerusalem, 1967], pp. 134-136) suggested yet another interpretation of Rashi. Like the Shittah Mekubbetzet, he too argues that Rashi does not base hafka'ah on a condition, for it would not be right to say that every betrothal is conditional. But he disagrees with the Shittah about the role played by the get. While the Shittah understands that the get which is invalid by Torah law was declared valid by the Rabbis, R. Berkowitz argues that the invalid get remains a mere piece of paper. The notion that a man betroths a woman with the understanding that his betrothal has Rabbinic approval implies that a man betroths a woman according to the laws and practices put into effect by the Sages of Israel. The Rabbis cancelled the marriage in the case where the husband cancelled the get in his wife's absence and in the case where the condition attached to the get was fulfilled by way of some unavoidable interference – that is to say, they enacted that if a man gave his wife such a get, the marriage is cancelled. R. Berkowitz concludes that a get is not indispensable for the cancellation of a marriage, for the get in these cases is in fact a mere piece of paper. The indispensable element is the law that the Rabbis enacted and the practices that they put into effect. The same law would apply to enactments instituted by later generations after the close of the Talmudic period. According to this interpretation of Rashi, there is clearly room to say that the Rabbis may legislate that if a husband acts wrongly in connection with monetary or custody matters, a court may cancel his marriage even without a get.

- ²⁷ The standard texts read: "Even though [אע"פ] he says, 'in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel,' it is as if he stipulated 'on condition that the Sages approve.'" The editor of Mossad HaRav Kook's edition of Ritva, Rabbi M. Goldstein, suggests the reading: "Therefore [ולפיכך], he says." R. Berkowitz infers from the standard text that according to Ritva, Rashi does not base hafka'at kiddushin on a condition, for according to Ritva, the plain meaning of the words "in accordance with the law of Moses and Israel" does not imply a condition. But according to R. Goldstein's reading, Ritva agrees with Rashi. This is supported by what Ritva says in his commentary to Bava Batra 48b, s.v., man: "Rashi already explained this in various places" – that is to say he (Ritva) and Rashi are in agreement.
- ²⁸ The Hafla'ah (Ketubot 3a) also understands that hafka'at kiddushin is based on a condition, similar to the condition, "You are betrothed to me on condition that Father approves". The Hafla'ah adds that when a person makes his betrothal conditional on Rabbinic approval, there is no concern that he will waive that condition, for the Rabbis said that if someone betroths a woman without attaching such a condition, his sexual intercourse will be considered an act of prostitution. According to the Hafla'ah, two principles are involved in hafka'at kiddushin: If the husband betrothed his wife on condition that the betrothal has Rabbinic approval, the Rabbis cancel the betrothal by withholding their approval; if he betrothed her without attaching such a condition, they cancel the betrothal by declaring the betrothal money ownerless (invoking the court's authority to declare property ownerless).
- ²⁹ R. Berkowitz (op. cit., p. 133) tries to identify the "great authorities" (gedolei olam) cited by R. Menahem Ha-Meiri as saying that some sort of get (get kol dehu) is needed. The novellae of Ri Ibn Megash to Ketubot have now been published in which that position is stated clearly.
- ³⁰ Yad Peshutah, Hilkhot Ishut 4:1; Hilkhot Gerushin 3:8.
- ³¹ See Tzitz Eliezer (vol. XV, no. 58): "It is noteworthy that Rambam does not appear to mention anywhere in his book this law of hafka'ah. I have already suggested to explain this on the basis of what I saw in Sefer Raban (Gittin), regarding this law of cancelling a get, that according to Rabbi [Yehudah HaNasi] if the husband cancelled the get, it is cancelled, and we rule in accordance with his opinion. He does not accept the argument, how do we affirm the authority of the court. [According to him], the court does not have the authority to cancel a marriage. Wherever the Talmud speaks about hafka'ah, it is according to Rabbi Shimon ben Gamliel, but Rabbi [Yehudah HaNasi] disagrees, and the law is in accordance with Rabbi [Yehudah HaNasi]." But this explanation requires further examination, for Rambam codifies all the cases of hafka'ah mentioned in the Gemara, even though he does not mention the principle of hafka'ah.
- ³² R. Rabinowitz notes further that Rif to Bava Batra 48b omits what is stated in the Gemara from the word afke'inh until be'ilat zenut. He suggests that perhaps Rif as well rejects the principle of hafka'at kiddushin. Two counter-arguments may be proposed: first, in the Mossad HaRav Kook edition of Rif, R. Sachs notes that the better versions of Rif do in fact contain the missing words; second, Rashba (Responsa, pt. 1, no. 1185) cites Rif's responsum regarding witnesses who are disqualified by Rabbinic law, in which he bases his ruling on the principle of hafka'ah.
- ³³ But see Menahem Elon, HaMishpat Halvri, p. 541, note 62, who questions whether R. Yosef Karo is in fact referring to a sage from the Geonic period, and not to one of the Rishonim.

- ³⁴ As was already noted by Seridei HaEish, pt. 3, no. 114. R. Berkowitz (op. cit., p. 152), on the other hand, tries to compare Raban to Tosafot, arguing that even according to Raban it would be possible to cancel a marriage at some later point after the time of betrothal, even without a get.
- ³⁵ Shiltei Gibborim (Bava Batra 45a in Rif) raised the same question and offered the same solution, except that he focused on the contradiction between Rashba and Maharik. But the same contradiction exists internally between the two responsa of Rashba.
- ³⁶ Pithei Teshuva (ad loc., note 30) refers to the responsum of Maharam Alashkar (cited above), who distinguishes between an enactment passed by a single community and an enactment passed by all the communities in the region. He seems to be suggesting that this distinction was accepted by Rema who wrote: "If a community enacted."

- ⁴⁰ Rabbi Yitzhak Halevi Herzog, Tehukah LeYisrael al Pi HaTorah, vol. 1, p.73. It should be noted that R. Herzog emphasizes that whatever he writes should be understood as a theoretical discussion, and not be taken as a practical guideline. On p. 74, he writes: "But we have never heard, G-d forbid, that anybody ever acted on this matter. And when certain people rose up to act, wishing to establish a new practice, the great authorities of the generation fiercely objected and the matter was forgotten and never mentioned." In note 18 on that same page there is a reference to Rav Herzog's approbation to R. Uziel's work: "But I must declare that I do not agree at all with the proposal in no. 45 regarding a conditional betrothal ... and while the author himself stresses that it is merely a proposal, nevertheless I find it necessary to make this declaration."
- ⁴¹ Elsewhere (pp. 82-83) Rabbi Herzog writes with greater caution: "As for hafka'at kiddushin, with attention paid to the words of Rashba, and the silence of the other authorities on this issue except for that which is stated explicitly in the Gemara, it would appear that we do not have that authority, even for a limited time. But in the future, if ordination is restored, and the Torah's authority is concentrated in Jerusalem with all or most of the fit communities and all the Rabbis of Israel accepting her authority, the matter will require a decision ... And even so we have found an exception to the rule in our master Rema's Darkhei Moshe, Even HaEzer 7, 13, where Rema cites in the name of Terumat HaDeshen, no. 241, with regard to women during the persecutions in Austria who were permitted [to return to their husbands] by the great Halakhic authorities ... It seems to me that they relied on that which they said that whoever betroths a woman betroths her with the understanding that he has Rabbinic approval, and the court has the authority to cancel a marriage ... I was later told that according to a responsum of an early Gaon⁴¹ they wanted to cancel a marriage, or they actually did so in a particular case. I must look for it, and if it happened like that, it is a great precedent, and we have the grounds to say that this authority was not removed from the sages of the generation even after the closing of the Talmud." In the next section he adds: "But this does not mean that we, orphans of orphans, should God forbid use this authority. Rather when we merit the arrangement that I mentioned – the restoration of ordination, or even without that restoration, the establishment of a High Court in Jerusalem with the agreement and acceptance of its authority on the part of a majority of the Torah-abiding residents in the land of Israel, and a majority of the Rabbis and fit communities in all the corners of the world – then it will be possible to consider such matters, a fixed order that will stand until the days of the Messiah."
- ⁴² In general, there are many more references to enactments allowing for the cancellation of marriage than to cases in which hafka'at kiddushin was actually implemented. See also Freiman, Seder Kiddushin VeNisu'in, p. 343, where he cites testimony that in the seven years following the enactment passed in Egypt, nobody even attempted to betroth a woman not in accordance with the enactment, for everybody knew that the betrothal would be cancelled.
